Contagious (संक्रामक) (Adjective) (kən- 'tā-jəs) (Neutral/Negative Tone)

- Meaning of word (English): Capable of spreading from one person to another through direct or indirect contact.
- Meaning of word (Hindi): जो एक व्यक्ति से दूसरे व्यक्ति तक प्रत्यक्ष या अप्रत्यक्ष संपर्क से फैल सकता है।
- Root word: Derived from Latin contagiosus (from contagion, meaning "contact or touch").
- Synonym: Infectious, Transmissible, Communicable

Use in Non-Fiction (300 words max.):

Diseases like influenza and COVID-19 are highly contagious, requiring precautionary measures to prevent their spread. However, not only diseases but also emotions and behaviors can be contagious. For instance, enthusiasm in a workplace can boost morale, while panic can spread chaos. Understanding the contagious nature of both biological and psychological phenomena helps in fostering a healthier society.

Correct and Incorrect Usage (English + Hindi Equivalent):

My Notes:

- Inanimate Objects
 - Inanimate objects are non-living things that lack life, movement, and consciousness. They do not breathe, grow, or reproduce, nor can they move on their own. Examples include books, chairs, rocks, and water. Unlike living beings, inanimate objects do not have thoughts or emotions. In grammar, they are typically referred to as "it" instead of "he" or "she" (e.g., "The phone is on the table. It needs charging.").
- Clap vs Applause
 - Clap and applause both involve striking hands together, but they differ in usage. A clap refers to a single instance of this action or the act itself, while applause is a collective response involving repeated clapping to express appreciation. For example, someone can give a clap of encouragement, but a performer usually receives applause from the audience. Additionally, clap can be used as both a noun and a verb, whereas applause is only a noun. While clap can be casual and individual, applause is more formal and often associated with public recognition.
