 - The Paradox of Choice
 - The Paradox of Choice suggests that while having choices is beneficial, too many options can lead to anxiety, decision paralysis, and dissatisfaction. Psychologist Barry Schwartz popularized this idea, arguing that excessive choices make people overthink, fear missing out (FOMO), and regret decisions more easily.
 - For example, choosing from 100 smartphone models can be more stressful than picking from 5 because we second-guess whether we made the "best" decision. This paradox highlights the importance of simplifying choices for better satisfaction and mental clarity.
 - Confinement is not just physical—it can be mental, social, or technological. The ability to recognize and break free from unnecessary confinement is key to personal and societal growth.

- Dunning-Kruger Effect

- The Dunning-Kruger Effect is a cognitive bias where people with low ability in a particular field tend to overestimate their competence, while highly skilled individuals often underestimate their expertise. This occurs because those with little knowledge lack the awareness to recognize their own shortcomings.
- For example, a beginner in chess might believe they can beat experienced players after learning a few strategies, whereas a grandmaster is aware of the vast complexities they still need to master.
- This effect highlights the importance of self-awareness and continuous learning to gain a more accurate understanding of one's abilities.

- Survivorship Bias

- Survivorship bias is a logical error where people focus on successful individuals or outcomes while ignoring those that failed, leading to distorted conclusions. This bias is common in business, investing, and self-improvement advice.
 - For example, many people study billionaires to learn the "secrets of success" without considering the countless entrepreneurs who failed despite using the same strategies. This creates an illusion that success is purely based on certain habits, rather than a mix of skill, luck, and circumstances.
 - Awareness of survivorship bias helps in making better, more balanced decisions by considering both successes and failures.
