Sometimes, it's the simplest things that bring the most delight.

- In a bustling city known for its towering buildings and fast-paced life, there was a small, tucked-away café on the corner of a narrow street. The café had been there for decades, a place where the outside world seemed to pause, even if just for a moment. Its owner, Clara, was a woman in her sixties with a mischievous smile and a reputation for making the most incredible pies. People came from all over the city for her apple pie, which was unlike anything they'd ever tasted.
- One rainy evening, a tired, business-suited man wandered into the café, seeking shelter. He didn't look like the type to stop at a quaint café, yet something about the warmth inside drew him in. Clara greeted him with a cup of tea and a slice of pie. As he ate, he found himself talking to her, something he hadn't done in years. They talked about everything—life, dreams, regrets, and joys.
- When he left, Clara handed him a small, handwritten note: "Sometimes, it's the simplest things that bring the most delight." The man, usually all-business, smiled for the first time in years.
- Years later, he would return, not for the pie, but for the peace he found in that little café—a place where the world slowed down and the soul could find delight in unexpected moments.

- Structure not using V4 (Still Correct, Less Common)
 - The country passed new laws. Thereby, it reduced crime significantly.  (less common, full sentence)
 - She left the window open. Thereby, the room got cold.  (stylistic, more formal)

In these last two examples, "thereby" starts a new sentence — this is correct but more formal or archaic. It's clearer and smoother to use the V4 form in modern writing.
