 - The Power of First Impressions: The Subtle Art of "Putting On" Confidence
 - First impressions are powerful—they can shape relationships, influence career opportunities, and even determine how people perceive us long-term. Interestingly, much of making a good first impression involves "putting on" confidence, even when we don't feel it.
 - Psychologists suggest that body language, tone of voice, and eye contact play a significant role in how confidence is perceived. A person who "puts on" an upright posture, a firm handshake, and a steady voice is often seen as self-assured, even if they feel nervous inside. This is because of a psychological effect known as self-fulfilling prophecy—when we act a certain way, others respond accordingly, reinforcing that behavior.
 - For instance, if a job candidate walks into an interview "putting on" a calm demeanor, the interviewer is more likely to treat them as competent and capable. Over time, this external projection of confidence can become internalized, reducing self-doubt.
 - However, balance is key. Over-exaggeration can come across as arrogance, while too little confidence may seem like insecurity. The goal is to use "putting on" as a tool to bridge the gap between who we are and who we aspire to be, allowing us to grow into our best selves.
